

Alamedans during World War II

Takeno Nakata's

incarceration camp artwork

Takeno immigrated from Chiya, Japan to Alameda, CA in 1920, pregnant with her first child, Alice. Two more daughters followed, Grace (Uriu)

and Mary (Tomita). The family moved to Los Altos in 1938 or 1939, but Mary stayed in Alameda with an uncle.

World War II: "The Japanese people had to move out of Alameda sometime in 1942 because of the naval air station

there," said Grace Uriu. "My uncle, aunt and my sister, Mary, moved in with us. We all went to Santa Anita and then to Heart Mountain."

It's there that Takeno carved these wood items.

Alamedans during World War II

Takeno Nakata's

incarceration camp artwork

Takeno immigrated from Chiya, Japan to Alameda, CA in 1920, pregnant with her first child, Alice. Two more daughters followed, Grace (Uriu)

and Mary (Tomita). The family moved to Los Altos in 1938 or 1939, but Mary stayed in Alameda with an uncle.

World War II: "The Japanese people had to move out of Alameda sometime in 1942 because of the naval air station

there," said Grace Uriu. "My uncle, aunt and my sister, Mary, moved in with us. We all went to Santa Anita and then to Heart Mountain."

It's there that Takeno carved these wood items.