

Takashi Kamine
Sociology

(1) The size of a population inhabiting an area helps to mold the social life and to set its social problems.

The making of the social life of the community, city, or nation depends upon the contents of the population. That is, people who are willing to cooperate with the government of the community and are willing to work as a unit ~~and~~ more apt to have a better community and the laws and orders of the community are set up, it is up to the citizen of the community to obey them - and it is the good citizen that obeys them. If the people are taught to obey them they will be accepted by any community. It is the duty of every citizen to cooperate. It is not the size of the population but the people who make up the population. This community group is more or less a social group where certain customs are developed and are maintained throughout many years. The cultural patterns and social patterns have taken years for development.

The inhabitants of a community are made up of families where <sup>the children are</sup> taught or "getting along" in social life. In schools you learn to apply it and also throughout life. It is the community in which you live that molds your social life and sets your social pattern.