The size of a population inhabiting an area helps to mold the social life and to set its problems.

Centuries ago when the populations of the world were sparsely scattered all over the world, such things as social life and social problems were not even thought about because each man or family ~~were~~ ^{hunted} or worked for their own food & clothing and were independent of each other. But as the population grew and people lived more or less in groups or communities naturally problems of social life will occur by friendly gatherings, parties; socials, and etc. Not only these are social problems but also sanitary conditions around the area, diseases, juvenile delinquency, and many others.

So as to tackle these problems the population inhabiting the area must get together and thus try to solve these problems concerning the social life in their community.

Some communities work harder than others to mold social life and thus having a clean neighborhood, good recreational activity; while others communities or areas where social life and problems are ignored or not taken of-by communities so much, develop into slums or a unhealthy place to live, also the children develop into delinquents easier in these areas.
