The size of a population inhabiting an area helps to mold the social life and to set its social problems.

In a small village or a town with a population of only a few hundred will very seldom worry about their social life and social problems because they are all acquainted and know each other very well and go about their business in a usual manner. When they are all so close together they feel as though they are in a same family, and whenever problem arises they may be aided by their respective neighbor. Thus, they learn to live together with different people, work together, play together, and learn to respect each other.

But when it comes to a large city where thousands of people inhabit the district you find all sorts of people. It is well if all people are fine people, but when thousands of people get together you are apt to find all sorts of people. Good people, bad people, rich, poor, and maybe ^{even} crooks or murders. Thus keeping the social problem firm is very difficult.
