I made a sketch of one of the brides - there were four couples who were married simultaneously - before she left her room, which she shared with roughly 25 other girls and almost delayed the whole ceremony by my poor knowledge of Russian and German which they speak.

Soons the time had arrived for her to leave and since my sketch was unfinished I was still working - until, after being "pinned down" under some rapid cross fire they finally pounded into my thick skull what the score was.

I followed the couple to the "garage" and stood on a chair while the ceremony was performed - it was beautiful in its simplicity - between occasional interruption to quiet the crowd the preacher spoke several sentences - then a couple which stood behind each bride and groom placed flowerwreaths on the heads of the bride and groom and to the accompaniment of a small choir and the droning voice of the preacher exchanged wreaths from the women's onto the men's and vice-versa. To make a short story shorter they next walked twice around in a small circle while well-wishers threw rice (?) in.

It is a common belief that when a person is suddenly about to die, past events of his life flash thru his mind in an instant.

Writers, especially screen scenarists, have made capital of this supposition. A few years ago one of the season's prize movies was filmed along that line. The story opened with the hero standing before a firing squad, and in the brief instant before the order to fire was given, the picture of his whole life raced thru his mind.

I couldn't vouch for the truth of such a psychological phenomenon, because I have never faced a firing squad.

But when I was three years old, I fell from an upper story of a house and as I plummeted earthward head first, I remember seeing a nearby red brick building upside down.

No past events of my young life flashed thru my mind. All I recall thinking was "What a helluva was to hit the ground!" However, all this has no direct bearing on what I actually started out to say. I was merely trying to draw a parallel between the foregoing and the feeling you get when you are leaving the center.

It is a very poor parallel, I will admit, because persons leaving the center are not about to die, altho there is a sharp difference of opinion on that when the destination happens to be California, where they say it with .32 caliber bullets.

What I am really trying to say, however, is that when the time comes to leave the center, all sorts of things pass thru your mind.

You think of the things you did and the things you didn't do. You think of the time wasted or the time well spent. You think of a lot of things.

But mostly you think

ONCE OVERS by B. TAKEDA

RUSSIAN WEDDING

Later I finished my drawing and was invited to share in the wedding "feast." I was reluctant to do so since I had just finished eating and then too, these people are only allowed so much rations--eventually I was dragged into it and placed beside the groom.

The meal, which I think was something special, consisted solely of one plate of macaroni, dry and without spices of any sort, to which was added small portions of meat that had no taste. Three glasses of "Vermouth" and a whitish, cloudy liquid which I will swear was gasoline completed the meal. I left the newlyweds and their friends since I had more sketching to do, but maybe more frankly, since I was afraid I would fade out if the drinks were passed around once more. As I left the room, I could feel the blood rushing to my head in violent protest to my over-indulgence.

The whole experience left me with a feeling of humbleness--that these people who have suffered so greatly and have so little to share materially treated me as one of their own but gave me their best. I am returning tomorrow with a wedding gift of cigarettes and candy.

you were able to meet such swellegant persons, and a bit of sadness comes over you when you think that you may never see them again.

You recall the countless coffee sessions you had with them, when a bunch of us just sat around and, over a tasty cup of java, talked about the evacuation, the war, the Nisei's future, postwar plans, about anything and everything.

You're going to miss these people. You're going to miss their companionship, their laughter, their encouragement, their intrinsic friendship.

But you know that your life has been made that much brighter and richer for having known them, and for that you're thankful.

I guess I'm just a sentimental softie. Little things touch me. Such as the little nabor girl bidding me good-bye and saying in a childish treble: "Bye-bye, Uncle Ben."

Or the nabor who clasps my hand and says: "Luck to you. We'll meet again." And I smile and say: "Sure, we'll meet again," tho' I know we probably never will.

But maybe those aren't such little things after all. Maybe there are more important things in the world than liking people and having people like you.

But for the moment, those friends and the fact that you're bidding them farewell are the most important things in the world.

And tho' you are looking forward to going back to California again, you feel a small lump in your throat that you find difficult to swallow.
