NISEI LEADERSHIP

Recurrent clashes and cleavages on many vital issues between Issei and Nisei is a disturbing fact which must be met conscientiously, carefully and with understanding if discordant conditions are to be avoided and life made as harmonious and happy as possible in the relocation centers. A few of both groups have become fully aware of this unpleasant situation, and attention has been called to the necessity for straightening out rather than ignoring the difficulties involved.

The Issei point of view on the whole matter has been presented very well previously in these pages. It is in order that the Nisei voice their opinions in the hope of finding a satisfactory solution.

From our standpoint, it appears that a basic but unfamiliar fact must be understood generally before anyone can proceed to achieve harmony out of discord. In the first place, it should be recognized that in these government projects it necessarily are the Nisei who have been placed in supervisory positions previously assumed by the Issei.

Such a sudden and sweeping shift of leadership and responsibility could not have passed without misunderstandings and maladjustments. It persists as a delicate situation calling for a tolerant attitude on both sides.

The Issei, we believe, must accept the actuality of having been relegated from an active to an advisory role at best. They must view with understanding the problems encountered by Nisei in carrying out new duties. Failure to recognize the completeness of this change of leadership and unreasonable criticism of a difficult condition, which the younger generation members are handling fairly capably are grounds for resentment and opposition to any advice the more experienced group may advance.

By realizing that the reins are in the hands of the spirited younger people, the Issei can fulfill their role as tactful advisors with true wisdom and dignity. I.T.

TO THE DISTANT HILLS

A cool desert breeze whipped around mesquites and sagebrushes while an overcast sky hung down on a quiet and lonesome countryside, as four energetic hikers set a brisk pace for the distant hills in search of petrified wood and other odd curios. With pep and vigor, they tramped along the well-worn trail as it wound its way further into more dense forest-like surroundings. Gradually, trees gave way to brush and soon they stumbled over sand and dried wood, with sweat covering their brows as the sun shone through the thinning clouds.

Under the last shady tree before the towering mesa in the distance, they rested to catch their breath and fan their hot brows and sip cool water.

Refreshed, they started again and soon they were clambering up the side of the steep hill along a ravine, little noticing the variegated colored rocks which covered the mountain side, too tired to think of little else than to reach the top.

Puffing they took the last weary step and at last reached the summit to look over the vast country. The view from the summit was inspiring, beautiful and dynamic. In the distance they saw the roof tops of Poston III laid out in the middle of a seemingly green valley, while smoke rose slowly from its chimneys. The jagged, mountains loomed up in the horizon further to the west. And they stood speechless and in awe admiring nature's handwork. The striking panorama from this plateau was worth the fatigue, sweat, thirst and long, dreary 10 miles tramp necessary to reach this spot.

The hikers returned tired and weary, loaded down with wood, colorful rocks and a ton of unnecessary sand in their shoes.

The discussion was confined to the specific problems of producing Japanese subsistence foods such as tofu, miso, moyashi, and noodles. Susumu Togasaki, chairman of the advisory board, reported that tofu manufacturing would soon become a reality as the equipment was already on its way. He also made the general statement that the consensus of opinion among board members was that, instead of setting up an elaborate organization, they preferred to start manufacturing activities on a small scale, gradually expanding personnel and offices to meet the needs of the various activities.

Coordination of production between the three units of Poston was discussed at length. Although no definite conclusions were reached on distribution of manufacturing activities, Mathiesen was warm in his praise for the progress made by the group in starting the tofu factory.

AH! A UNIFORM

Is it the uniform that "gets" the gals? The question was raised one morning in the press office as the entire staff, majority of which was girls, made a mad rush to the clothing issuance dept. The object of their hurried mission was the army coats being given to the workers. Plowing through ankle deep dust, we finally piled into the "room in back of the police dept." to which we had been instructed. Approaching the young man who was smiling indulgently at us from behind the counter, we demanded he display his wares. Picking up the enormous coats which he stated, matter of factly, was the smallest he had, we laughingly proceeded to don them, closely, examining the super-drape effect created. After considerable jocular comment on the roomy fit, tailored lines, and "attractive" color, we looked around to the other side of the room, to see some fellows struggling valiantly into garments three or four sizes too small for their virile shoulders. Others who had already succeeded in squeezing into coats presented a spectacle somewhat resembling that of desperate men in strait jackets. Within a few minutes, however, we found ourselves outside, preciously holding identical army coats.

Now our staff consists of "gators in zoot suits, and Jacket Boys, well worthy of comparison to Hollywood's Sweater Girls.
