"Urbanites as Farm Laborers"

J. M. Tinley tells of experiences of himself and his family in Penryn, a small fruit-growing community. "In 1940 Penryn had a population of some 500 persons about half of whom were Japanese. The latter not only operated many of the fruit farms but also supplied the bulk of the permanent and seasonal labor needs of the community. Few itinerant fruit pickers and packers were necessary. The evacuation of the Japanese resulted in a very serious labor shortage, especially as their orchards were taken over and operated by local packing houses, farmers and others...." The writer elaborates on the labor situation and how many difficulties can be overcome. California Cultivator, October 31, vol. 89, no. 22, pp. 539, 550, #1966
