The house was surrounded by a deathly stillness that covered its two companions inside like a cloak. The ghostly night outside was as silent as a graveyard, shattered only by the crackling thunder and lightning and the steady drizzle of the ever persistent rain. Emily, one of the unfortunate persons who happened to be stranded in the house with her companion, Matilda, shivered.

"That's the third candle that blew out in the five minutes we were here. It scares me," sobbed Emily.

"In all my forty five years, and your forty six years, I bet this is the most idiotic thing that ever happened to me."

Then, from a distant cloud came the bright show of lightning. And in that same instant that the light from the lightning flowed thru the house, there came a high, piercing scream only Emily can send both.

"What is it, Emily? What is it?" cried out Matilda,

As another lightning flashed thru the windows, the girls saw illuminated on the large stairway striding slowly toward them a large shaggy face covered with long hair, an enormous beast that had the faint resemblance to a human being bearing right for them.

45 and
46?

Then silence.
