for the twentieth time that morning don anaut stooped over and cranked his elizabeth, and for the twentieth time the stubborn car gave a few grunts, rattled its fenders and went to sleep. again don went over the same process of getting his betty into a wakeful mood. this time the lizzy spluttered and coughed, the fenders began to vibrate, and the car to move forward in quick jerks.

but this sudden burst of vivacity was short lived. another crank resulted in a feeble cough, a loud pop-something backfired--and the playfulness of the car subsided.

with a final angry twist don cranked the betsy. the car rattled, coughed and then steadily the putt-putting rose to a rumbling roar. the running board--there was one on the ford-- was rattling loudly, bits of sticks and rubbish on the car were hopping up and down in unison to the vibration of the elizabeth. a few minutes later the car was seen running out of sight with a non too steady chugg-chugg of the engine.
