CLEVELAND. - JACL has answered the Negroes' "painful call for help," Rep. Spark M. Matsunaga of Hawaii told the EDC-MDC joint convention in Cleveland, Ohio on Sunday.

"I am happy to note that it has," the dynamic ex-100th Bn. officer told the convention banquet audience at the Sheraton Cleveland Hotel

He then cited the "strong, comprehensive and unequivocal statement endorsing the intensified actions of Negro Americans" which a National JACL ad hoc Committee on Civil Rights formulated July 20-21 in Omaha, Neb.

For the benefit of those who had not heard the statement, he recited the statement.

Was Against March

"I am happy to note too that the JACL actually did participate in the March in Washington, alhough I must confess that I was against the march due to a genuine apprehension that there would be violence and bloodshed, and as a consequence the civil rights fight would be set back many, many years instead of being advanced. I thank God that I was wrong."

Matsunaga stated that an even more substantial way in which the JACL has answered to the call for help was in assuming an aggressive role to influence legislation. "The statement of the JACL endorsing meaningful civil rights legislation, submitted on Aug. 3, 1963, to the Subcommittee on Civil Rights of the Committee on Judiciary of the House of Representaives, by your Washington Representative, Mike Masaoka, is a "As members of the JACL, you alert and spirited leadership, is at the forefront of the present civil

STUDIO

From the Frying Pan

Denver, Colo.

AUTUMN MADNESS - The mushroom season is full upon us. Each weekend, scores of automobiles loaded with individuals who trace their ancestry to the hills of Japan head for the northern Colorado Rockies, specifically the Roosevelt National Forest above Red Feather Lakes. There they disperse into the cool, moist pine woods in search of an aromatic variety of mushroom that, until fairly recently, had been believed to grow only in the Cascade mountains of the Pacific Northwest.

In a year of plentiful late summer rainfall, such as this one, the yield is enormous. The harvest for each party is measured in terms of bushels. We used to hear of such harvests in Seattle in unusual seasons, but mostly people like my fathen were happy if they brought home three or four dozen.

I don't know the scientific name for this particular variety of mushroom that the Japanese prize so highly, but one of these days I'll try to find out. Whatever its name, surely it must be queen of all forest fungus growths. Its flesh is creamy white, its texture firm, its aroma distinctive, its flavor delicious cooked in any number of ways. It is incomparable in sukiyaki, or fried in butter and seasoned with salt and pepper.

THE ELUSIVE FUNGUS - Searching for the mushroom compares in delight with the eating. Sometimes the mushroom stands boldly in the open, its umbrella spread, and one need but stumble on it to find it. But more often this variety of mushroom is half-hidden in the undergrowth, or it peeks coyly out of a bed of black forest humus. So vigorous is its growth that often the bud mushroom carries a layer of humus with it up out of the ground, looking for all the world like the nuclear submarine Nautilus just after it had emerged up through the North Pole's eternal icecap.

The only hint to the half-hidden mushroom's whereabouts is a flash of white seen among the fallen pine needles, underbrush and toppled logs. Often a patch of sunlight, a stray leaf, a bit of broken granite are mistaken for the fungus. But when the mushroom itself is discovered in a particularly difficult lie, the thrill of discovery is comparable to the thrill that sweeps the fisherman when a trout boils up out of the depths and strikes his fly.

Why else does a mushroom seeker dash to collect his prize, as though the mushroom were a mobile and elusive creature, rather than a bit of vegetable matter rooted firmly to the ground? It is the excitement of the chase, and the mushroom is the only immobilized thing I know of that is capable of stirring this sort of spirited action.

PREPARING FOR THE CHASE — The only equipment one needs for pursuing the mushroom is a good pair of eyes and a strong pair of legs. Most of the devotees of the sport are Issei; consequently the woods seem to be overrun with stubby figures in outlandish outdoors costume trudging with single-minded concentration up hill and down vale.

An ordinary long-handled dandelion digger is considered an ideal tool for capturing the mushroom. The steel digger enables one to pry the mushroom loose from the soil, which is quite a task sometimes since it has a way of nesting among the rocks and under the overhang of fallen logs. The long handle makes the tool handy as a walking stick, and as a probe for poking around in the humus and under the

The appearance of so many dandelion diggers in the woods led one Caucasian to ask: "Going out to spear a few mushrooms?"

One other item is necessary for the successful mushroomer. It is a large freezer. For after one has shipped mushrooms via air freight, at enormous cost, to friends in California and Oregon and Washington and Chicago and elsewhere, given mushrooms to local friends, and eaten one's fill, there's not much to do but freeze the rest for consumption, savoring and reminiscing at some later time.

It wasn't long thereafter, that I suddenly sensed a need for some radical personal and social walk with a people and for a changes-or as some would say, adjustments. Living in a school dormitory and within a new city environment or whatever the other reasons may have been-I soon became aware that I had brought a needless amount of hayseed and straw with me to Los. Angeles.

As farm folks say, there was a lot of plowing under to do and too much ground to walk to plow. Perhaps this is what some people say as being the trials and tribulations of "coming off the farm" In this regard, I am happy that there are no such problems confronting our farm youth of today. However, all was not tribulation -for here too, we found blessings in our days of need. in disguise.

In choosing to not to walk alone, we sought the help of other youth. The youth to youth or student to student relations grew into a friend with friend endeavor. Within these friendships, I became less aware of the size of the field to plow or the distance to walk in following the plow-for I now walked together.
