"You always act so ashamed," the daughter accused her mother. 'It's hard for me to be close to you when you're so ashamed of me." Another parent in the family therapy session interrupted to tell her: "You have a tendency to blame your mother without understanding her emotions." And he turned to the mother: "I think you feel inferior because you're a member of a minority race. And because your daughter has misbehaved, it's another nail in your coffin of shame."

The mother, in admitting to the truth of that comment, broke down in tears, signaling the relief that admission has unloosed after weeks of denial.

"Let's go back," suggest Dr. Thomas Wilson, psychiatrist and consultant at Las Palmas. "I was very touched by your tears. How did you feel just now?"

"I cried," the mother responded as a concerned young resident passes her a box of tissue, "because I didn't realize that he could understand how I feel," indicating the man seated at her right.

Under the gentle probing of the entire group, the Japanese American mother related her heretofore repressed resentment during the World War II evacuation and internment of her people. The parents in the group listened, ashamed. The Las Palmas teenagers, born long after World Even during that period the War II, had their eyes open in new-found compassion. Asked what she was feeling at that moment, she explained:

"I'm crying because I'm sad because it happened that way. And I'm mad because it happened that way."

Straightening up, the daughter said that before the Las sion to view the treasures was Palmas family group sessions, she had been ashamed of her ethnic origin. "But now I feel like I'm somebody, that I'm proud and want to stand up for my race."

Last year, Miss Fay found that the Sansei (like the daughter at Las Palmas School) "in a period of ferment . . a changing breed of cat" and quoting Dr. Robert Wilson of UCLA, director of the Japanese American Research Project, "We don't know what to think about them-and neither do they."

Described as the spokesman for the younger generation, JACL Youth Director Alan Kumamoto told Miss Fay a "typical Sansei still runs around with Japanese American groups and has ideas which are basically like those of his Nisei parents." However the important difference, in Alan's opinion, was that "high school kids identify more as whites . . . they don't consider themselves Japanese." This identity crisis hits hard in college, he told Miss Fay: "You may think you're white-but you see that others don't think so when you can't get into this or that sorority or fraternity. That's when you suddenly find out you're not equal."

This has produced the side effect of Sansei becoming interested in Japanese culture and his heritage "in order to find out who you really are." Another important change, 1946, Sgt. As for the daughter being committed to Las Palmas, group psychiatric social worker, Mrs. Jane Bolen, suggested it had been an indirect result of her lack of pride in her race—that her refusal to accept her identity led her to run around with bad companions.

The Japanese, through their feeling for history, have achieved a small miracle by preserving many examples of the most important artifacts that were ever produced in the Far East. The location of these treasures of man is the SHOSO-IN at Nara.

The Shosho-In is one of the oldest buildings in Japan and is certainly of the oldest wooden buildings in the world. The building itself is unique in that it dates from about 751 A.D. It was originally intended to be the repository of the Todaiji. The fact that a wooden treasure house has stood for over twelve hundred years against the destructive has not only survived intact, but preserved a collection of rare treasure, is little short of miraculous.
