Law Enforcement

Arnett believes enforcement of this law will reduce the state unemployment rate by almost one-third. It could do more towards solving the unemployment problem.

Attorneys from California Rural Legal Assistance who contested the law also had great reservations about the wisdom of the state law, which is also pending nationwide in the bill by Rep. Peter Rcdino (D-N.J.). CRLA, along with the United Farm Workers and Chicano civic groups, feel enforcement should be done selectively. "Everybody would be upset, if the State of California should now decide to use the law against the illegals who have been in the state for a long time and have families here," CRLA lawyer Burton Fretz of Santa Maria

Not Forgotten: Southeast Asians

A year ago this week, the first wave of Southeast Asian refugees were arriving in Camp Pendleton and other installations-seeking clothing, food, housing and sponsors. About 130,000 refugees were brought to the United States. The estimated 25,000 Southeast Asians in Southern California represent the major corps of the 1975 Asian refugees.

This past week came the good news that an estimated 60 per cent of them are independent of direct assistance, and that churches and other agencies are still helping families not yet fully on their feet.

JACL chapters, notably Contra Costa, are offering a helping hand to those still unfamiliar and trying to Continued from Front Page adjust to their new life in America—an effort that tries to improve their language skills, secure job training and find a place in their respective community.
